He just received a notice from the IRS stating he owed $77,000 in back taxes and penalties. A month later, his business card was turned in to the IRS. He decided to pay his back taxes and comply with the tax laws. He also wanted to make sure that he and his company were compliant. All to make sure that no one could come after him with a lawsuit for the years before. He created a budget for his back taxes and consulted with his accountant to determine what he could do. Before he got into this program, he had a rather large amount of money invested in all types of contracts and products. He needed to reduce the number of contracts so he could save money and increase his profits. He created his first studio album in which he released everything that was on the record. This is usually the beginning of any recording career. He got rid of all of his contracts that didn't help him create music and finances. He then made a list of his current contracts that didn't help him financially or produce music. From there, he went through each contract to determine if it was worth his time to continue to work with the producer. If he found a producer that didn't want him to work on his album and the contract was a long term contract that he wasn't using the money he was paying for the producer, he would ask for a release of all of the money that he had paid to that producer. He used that money to pay his taxes and for any savings he had. He then started looking at his contracts to see what he could eliminate so that he could make more money. There was no 82157476af
